How to get rid of stalkers in public places.

Problem:

Recently a young, cute female waitress named Sally told me about a re-occurring problem with a customer named Butch. He was constantly hitting on her and asking her out on a date even though he was grandfather level of maturity if you catch my drift.

Available Resources: GrandGuy and his friends.

The Solution:

So together we brainstormed up the solution. Sally would ask a trusted customer named GrandGuy (what a nickname) that was at the lunch counter every day to support her. The very next time Butch hit on Sally, she would casually glance over to GrandGuy and simply say: 'Hey Dad, would you and Mom be okay if I go out with Butch here? He has been asking me out for quite awhile.'".

So why does this work? First, it allows Butch to retreat gracefully and the restaurant management is not involved. In fact, if Butch wants to keep eating here, he simply moves to another section of the restaurant. And if Butch makes a scene, then GrandGuy has a group of friends stand up and walk over to Butch's table and just say "Hi, we are good friends of Sally and we would like to know what is going on." And if the restaurant management does not support this method, then Sally needs to find somewhere else that will support their employees. What do you think about that? A Funny: What happens when a customer says "What's wrong with you, this coffee tastes just like dirt." just to be rude because she KNOWS the coffee was brewed perfectly? The waitress calmly responds, "Why thank you sir for the kind complement, your coffee was fresh ground just this morning" .
